“Jung and the Divided Psyche”

Presented by Mark Saban

I aim to address the question of dissociation from the perspective of Jungian psychology. Jung sees dissociation as normal for the healthy psyche. For Jung dissociation is not pathological in itself; pathology comes about when the different parts of the psyche (articulated by Jung as complexes and as archetypal figures) are unable to communicate with each other and with the ego complex. Jung’s dissociative model of the psyche thus contrasts with the psychoanalytic model of repression which sees any dissociation as inherently pathological. I aim to explore the implications of this idea with regard to both intrapsychic and intersubjective (transference/countertransference) dynamics occurring within analysis.
